Idaho Associated General Contractors Announces its Endorsement

BOISE, Idaho – Idaho Associated General Contractors (AGC) has named Brad Little as its pick to be Idaho’s next governor. Idaho AGC is a statewide trade association representing commercial construction including industrial, buildings and highways. Idaho AGC has served as the voice of the construction industry in the Gem State for more than eight decades.

“Our association promotes a better future for our industry and the thousands of Idahoans it employs and that is why we stand behind Brad Little to be Idaho’s next governor. He knows that construction is the foundation for a prosperous economy and as we have already seen in his service to the state, Brad has shown himself to be dedicated to smart and responsible growth, and improving income wages for working families,” said Idaho AGC President Chuck Graves.

Idaho AGC is made up of almost 600 member companies from around the state of Idaho and supports providing unified industry leaders, advocacy, workforce development, meaningful education and training courses.

“We have a booming economy and construction is taking place in communities all around Idaho. Construction provides jobs for a variety of skill levels and puts Idahoans back to work so they can provide for their families,” said Lt. Governor Little. “Thank you to the Idaho AGC for its support. Its members and I both know that the time for investment in our infrastructure is now.”
